

Imagine you have a drink and you have to answer your buddy's questions. His questions are not about death penalty or the war in Afghanistan, rather about the less important issues of our time: television, junk food, energy drinks, body piercing etc.

If you had to move to another country for life and never leave, where would you go?

Which is harder to hit well: a golf ball or a tennis ball?

For one year would you rather give up talking on cell phone or watching television shows?

Which is more fun: Friday night or Saturday night?

Would you rather be forced to give up e-mail or salt?

You suddenly have the ability to implant a song in your enemies' head. Which one do you pick?

Which is more of a sport: cheerleading or bowling?

Starting tomorrow, you must trade places with a celebrity. Whose famous life would you like?

Would you rather give up chocolate or cheese?

Would you rather face a charging bull or a swarm of killer bees?

What's worse: the limp handshake, the sweaty handshake, or the iron-grip handshake?

Would you rather be a star musician, a star athlete, or a movie star?

You've won the lottery. Do you want a check for one million tomorrow, or twelve yearly instalments for one hundred thousand.

Would you rather put a cup of sand in your bed or a half teaspoon of gravel in your shoes?

You have a pistol with one bullet. Would you rather face an angry wolf or an angry cobra?

What's the least fun month of the year?

Would you rather be an expert in karate, piano, or car repair?
